Boisterous and funny, provocative and punchily written. Many of the leading political figures were groomed for office by their parents, such as Robert Peel, whose father had secured baronetcy and a seat in the Commons after making his fortune as a Lancashire cotton magnate, but whose political ambitions settled on his son.

He tellingly describes MPs' constant round of activity, in some cases futile. More than in any other period of history, parliament has been denied its function as the forum to establish change, with many government bills now being announced to the press direct via news briefings and photo opportunities, rather than channelled for debate on the floor of the Commons.
