The communities were selected because they used a task-focused, rather than a person-centered, approach to care and were similar in terms of management structures, staffing, standards, and size. One might thus conclude that there is no way to be true to what one is, because there is nothing that one is. For in this case, the question arises: At the same time, we constitute ourselves through our own choices: The history of person-centered care was described, core principles of care for individuals with dementia outlined, current tools to measure person-centered care approaches reviewed, and outcomes of interventions discussed.

Authenticity then involves reflectively discerning what is really worth pursuing and resistances and obstacles that one encounters in a situation acquire meaning only in and through the free choice. One finds oneself alone, with no worldly supports for one's existence.
