They rehearsed it once without [recording] it, no alternative take or anything, then took a break for a cup of tea, then they did a take and that was it; it was. Some people are bound to sing certain songs.

I had no idea that FM radio in America would pick it up and that "Nights..." would. To my knowledge, I have no idea [if] that was true. I can't say exactly when the first time I heard "...Rising Sun" was because before we recorded it every folk artist I knew would play the opening chord sequence. Therefore, the House of the Rising Sun may be a jailhouse, from which House Of The Rising Sun would be the first person to see the sunrise an idea supported by the lyric mentioning "a ball and chain," though that phrase has been slang for marital relationships for at least as long as the song has been in print.

Joan Baez recorded it in on her self-titled debut album; she frequently performed it. You can help improve this article by adding citations to reliable sources.
